

Transcript | Martha Lane Fox OpenLearn Introduction

At The Open University, we know that high-quality education is a powerful resource, but access to it is unevenly distributed across the world. We believe that access to education can help build a healthier fairer more environmentally aware, and more fulfilled society. We are committed to delivering solutions which ensure greater access to high-quality education.

In 2006, The Open University set up OpenLearn, to play a part in transforming access to education by making much of its course material available freely online. OpenLearn provides access to free higher education, without barriers to entry, and for anyone anywhere in the world.

OpenLearn's goals are, to continue to give free access to, and raise awareness of lifelong learning, to continue to encourage the participation in and benefits of higher education, and to continue to create relevant high-quality free learning for inquisitive minds all over the world.

OpenLearn was also one of the very first websites to make its learning materials freely available through a Creative Commons license ensuring content could be adapted, translated and reused by anyone. OpenLearn receives over half a million visitors each month and generates hundreds of registered users every day, it also supports registered students of The Open University helping to prepare them for formal study. By increasing the opportunity for free lifelong learning, The Open University can bring about real change in people's lives.