I began the research that was eventually to result in this book during 1996–7, when I was able to spend a year's study leave from my position in the Department of Human Sciences at Brunel University as a Visiting Research Professor in the Institute of Educational Technology at the Open University. The research was originally intended by way of background work to the main purpose of my visit, which was to investigate approaches to studying in students with a hearing loss who were studying with the Open University. In the event, the background work took on a life of its own in parallel with my project on students with a hearing loss. I was able to retain my appointment as a Visiting Research Professor on a part-time basis after my return to Brunel University and I am grateful to both these institutions for their support over the last four years.

Particularly in the first of those four years, I was very grateful to Thaiquan Lieu, who was then the Project Officer in the International Centre for Distance Learning at the Open University, for his invaluable assistance in locating many of the sources mentioned in this book. Subsequently, I benefited greatly from many helpful discussions with Alison Ashby, Alan Woodley and their colleagues in the Student Research Centre at the Open University. The debates and discussions that I had with the late Alistair Morgan were particularly instrumental in bringing the present work to fruition, and his critical viewpoint and kind support are both greatly missed. Finally, I am also very grateful to David Kember, Diana Laurillard, Erik Meyer, Jan Vermunt and David Watkins for their comments on an earlier working paper that formed the basis for this book.
